The government is extending its main post-Brexit scheme for helping traders move goods from GB to Northern Ireland.

The Trader Support Service (TSS) was set up in 2020 to help businesses deal with new customs processes.

The current contract, held by a Fujitsu-led consortium, was due to expire at the end of this year.

That contract has been extended for another year; a competitive process will be held to find an operator for 2026 onwards.

Earlier this year the National Audit Office (NAO) said the government expects to have spent £531m on the TSS between December 2020 and December 2024.

HMRC said: "The current TSS has been extended to the end of 2025 as the implementation of the Windsor Framework progresses.

"The service is a key part of the government's help for businesses adjusting to the new trading environment. "

From January 2021 commercial goods entering Northern Ireland from GB have needed customs declarations.

The TSS effectively acts as government-backed customs agent on behalf of businesses.

The government intends to continue simplifying the customs processes through a combination of technology and improved administration.

Meanwhile it has been confirmed that Maroš Šefčovič is to remain the EU's chief negotiator with the UK.

Mr Šefčovič has been appointed to a new position as European Commissioner for Trade and Economic Security but will retain responsibility for engaging with the UK.

The UK is seeking a reset in relations with the EU which includes an aim to negotiate an "ambitious" new agri-food agreement.
